GET RICH Quick PANCAKES

Pancakes sat down on a rock beneath the cool shady branches of an old oak tree to rest. " 'Man O' Man', it's hot out there in the baillin' al' sun," he sighed, as he leaned his bag of groceries against the trunk of the tree. Going to the store every Saturday for Mammy was a task Pancakes didn't look forward to with much pleasure. He leaned back against the tree and half closed his eyes. "Diss is mare like it," he said aloud, settling back comfortably. He wiggled his bare feet in a patch of sandy ground. It felt cool and soft as the dust moved in between the toes of his tired and hot little feet.

In another minute Pancakes would have been asleep if he hadn't glimpsed something round and white showing through the leaves of the tall dry grass by his side. Pancakes leaned forward, his drooping eyelids lifted as he looked down curiously. "Well sha' enough," he exclaimed aloud, "it's an egg! A real honest and truly chicken egg!"—He was up on his feet in an instant bending over his find. It was in a nest—a chicken's nest. Pancakes stood erect and looked all around searching the countryside carefully. "Nape," he said, shaking his head from side to side, "I sha' don't see any chicken around here." He turned back to the egg, grinning. "It's mine!!" he squealed with delight. "Da hens dane left da nest far good and finders is keepers." He picked his prize up carefully and examined it. He held it close to his ear listening hopefully. "Hat dawg," he exclaimed, grinning from ear to ear. "Dere's a baby chicken gonna hatch outa diss egg."

Holding his new found treasure carefully Pancakes gathered up his bundles and hurried on far home. He didn't mind the hot sun anymore and he hardly knew he was carrying a heavy bag of groceries. No sir, nothing else counted but the egg and a little counting that Pancakes was doing in his head.

"Let me see naw," he calculated carefully. "Da chicken dat's gonna hatch from diss egg is gonna lay another egg every day;

I'm gonna take twenty of those eggs and dey's gonna hatch into twenty more chickens." A proud grin showed his little white teeth. "Twenty more chickens is gonna lay twenty more eggs each.—Dat's four-hundred eggs and they'll hatch into four hundred chickens.—Wowie!!!" exclaimed Pancakes, "I'se practically a millionaire already"—But he didn't stop with four hundred chickens, not Pancakes. On he went with his arithmetic—"twenty eggs from four hundred chickens— -is - - is." — At last he fairly exploded with the answer—"eight thousand eggs and dat's eight thousand chickens".——

Pancakes broke into a run—Mammy had ta hear about this good news—They were rich now; prably the richest people in the world. He could hardly wait to tell her, but wait!—Pancakes stopped dead in his tracks. "If eight thousand chickens lay twenty eggs apiece"—Pancakes thought very carefully—he swallowed hard—this was too much for even Pancakes to believe; yet, he knew that figures didn't lie. He said it aloud, shaking his head from side to side as if it really weren't so—"If eight thousand chickens will lay twenty eggs apiece and they hatch out that will be one hundred and sixty thousand chickens."

Pancakes' eyes grew bigger, his grin wider as the incredulous figure took shape in his head—then, all at once he ran down the street shouting at the top of his voice: "Mammy! We's rich! We's rich! I got a hundred on' sixty thousand chickens, we's rich, Mammy!" He raced through the gate and up on the steps still shouting but when he reached the top step—Ker-plop!! He tripped and fell and down went Pancakes, groceries and the egg in a littered mess! Pancakes slowly lifted his head to behold his prize and fortune broken to pieces—the shell of the egg still clinging to the end of his nose. He lifted it off and studied it in silent remorse; just a piece of old broken eggshell—all that remained of his once fabulous chicken farm.
